

ABSTRACT

A folding cellular phone includes an antenna to which a depression switch and a rotation switch are connected. A user can allow the cellular phone in a folded state to execute a predetermined operation by operating a tip portion of the antenna. For example, it is made possible to display a menu on a second display unit or to issue an alarm signal by pressing and rotating operations for the tip portion.